

- MS. SCHLAU: The arm moves. And there's a good reason for that - because the Mouse's arm is supposed to lower itself down. Mr. Kurtseifer tests everything one more time to make sure it works - yes, it looks good. Now the Mouse can be attached to the bridge.
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: This needs to be done very carefully. Nobody wants the Mouse to fall into the Rhine River. Securely attached, the Mouse is now hanging on the Hohenzollern Bridge. Mr. Kurtseifer checks once again if the Mouse's arm can move (SICH BEWEGEN). Yup, no problem. They're ready for the evening.
- MS. SCHLAU: Tonight's fireworks are called "Cologne Lights" and the Mouse gets to open them in honor of its birthday. The countdown begins. Mr. Kurtseifer is ready and ignites the light spears.
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: From the other side you can now see the Mouse made of fire, and the Elephant as well.
- MS. SCHLAU: The Mouse's arm moves slowly down, and it looks like the Mouse is lighting the rocket (RAKETE)!
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: And now the 40 for the Mouse's birthday lights up. Happy Birthday!
- MS. SCHLAU: What wonderful fireworks! Don't you think?
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: Thank you, but... I'd really prefer it if JOWO could spit out another good poem. Ah, I think we're just about there.
- MS. SCHLAU: Umm, Professor, some of the students are quickly fleeing the room. I think they're afraid that JOWO will...produce another mean and dangerous poem.
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: Hey, please stay. I'm sure that JOWO will now create, um... perhaps a cool rap for you.
- MS. SCHLAU: Ahhhhh!
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: - What is it?
- MS. SCHLAU: JOWO displayed a new poem. Don't look, students. Don't look, Professor. It's even worse than the first poem and could cause severe stomach ache and extreme hair loss.
- PROFESSOR EINSTEIN: Help, we need to evacuate right away. Emergency! Sound the alarm! All students go outside. Save yourselves if you can!